Data and events today

Today we get the REINZ housing data at 9.00am and BusinessNZ performance of services index at 10.30am. It's a quiet day across the Tasman, with no data scheduled for release in Australia.

Financial markets

Currency: It was another whippy night in global FX markets, with the USD DXY index moving up and down on tariff news, events in Europe (specifically majority support for Germany's investment fund and the associated relaxation of the so-called debt brake) and as markets contemplated a government shutdown which ended up being averted. The Kiwi is higher as a result, thanks mainly to EUR strength as it continues to underperform peers. NZD/AUD also rates a mention – it traded above 0.9091 (below 1.10 in AUD/NZD terms) in New York but closed just below that key level. A sustained break above 0.9091 would be technically noteworthy.

Rates: US bond markets remain volatile, but yields are higher since the local close on Friday. That's likely to see the local yield curves open with a bias to go mildly higher/steeper, but markets may be hesitant to move too far ahead of this week's Fed decision, which is shaping up to be a key event, with a particular focus on their "dot plot" projections. But while the Fed may be forced to stand pat for a bit longer, sluggish growth and a yawning output gap here suggest that the RBNZ has plenty of scope to continue easing.

Global markets overview

Key equity indices firmed into the end of the week on hopes that a US government shutdown would be averted (and it was), shrugging off a report of surging US inflation expectations. In Europe, markets also took encouragement from the cross-party agreement for Germany's proposed EUR500bn investment fund. By the numbers, the US S&P 500 closed 2.1% higher at 5,639, while the Euro Stoxx 50 and the FTSE 100 indices closed 1.4% and 1.1% higher respectively. In bond markets, the bellwether US 10yr Treasury bond yield was up 4bp to 4.31%. In commodity markets, the active WTI oil future was up 0.9%, at USD67.2/bbl, while gold was up 1.4% at USD2,984.2/oz.

Data/event pulse

US: The March preliminary University of Michigan survey of consumer confidence weakened, with the headline index falling 6.8pts to 57.9. The index has fallen 16.1pts from its post-election high in December at 74.0. Weakness in March was led by deteriorating expectations which dropped 9.8pts to 54.2. Inflation expectations picked up sharply in response to tariff announcements but the outlook for household income and jobs also fell. 1-yr inflation expectations

Rose 0.6% to 4.9% and the 5-10 yr inflation outlook rose 0.4% to 3.9%, its highest level since 1993.

UK: Jan GDP fell 0.1% m/m, which was below market expectations of a +0.1% gain. The fall was driven by a slump in manufacturing production, which fell -1.1% m/m. Services fared slightly better, rising +0.1% m/m. On a 3m/3m basis. GDP was up +0.2%.

Commentary – key themes and views

Inflation anxiety: The preliminary March survey of consumer sentiment by the University of Michigan reflected intensifying anxiety among consumers and households due to the major policy changes taking shape under the new Trump administration. Measures of consumer confidence indicate what consumers feel, not necessarily what consumers do. But large sudden weakness in consumer expectations can manifest in more precautionary spending plans. So from a growth perspective it is important that elevated consumer anxiety is short-lived. Private consumption accounts for 70% of US GDP. For the FOMC which is embarking on the second policy meeting of the year, the short run signals on the economy are mixed. CPI and PPI inflation were soft in February, but some measures of inflation expectations have jumped. The headline labour market data fared reasonably well in February, but consumers and businesses are increasingly anxious. Prolonged uncertainty can delay business hiring and investment. Holding steady on policy until greater clarity emerges is the appropriate response for now.
