

Colombia: Broad-Based Activity Expansion in January; Public Administration Probably Boosted by Budgetary Rollover (Tellez)

BOTTOM LINE: Monthly activity posted a broad-based expansion across all sectors, but with a softer services composition than implied by the headline number. Real economic activity firmed by 0.8% mom sa in January, slowing from 1.5% mom sa in Dec. '24. Across sectors, primary activities (agriculture, mining) grew by a solid 1.0% mom sa. Secondary (manufacturing and construction) and tertiary activities grew more moderately, each at 0.6% gog sa. On an annual basis, real activity expanded by 2.6% yoy (2.5% yoy sa), above the Bloomberg consensus for a 1.9% yoy variation. With the January reading, the statistical carry-over for 1Q2025 growth is tracking at a robust +1.4% gog sa, and for the whole of 2025 at 2.0%. Folding in today's surprise we mark up our growth estimate for 2025 by 15bp to 2.7%. That said, we do not view today's strong reading as necessarily reflecting the underlying strength of the economy, and we still see activity moderating in upcoming months. We suspect that a large budgetary rollover stemming from unexecuted funds from 2024 was largely behind this upside surprise—real central government spending ex-interest grew 23% yoy in January. All told, we now see a lower probability that the MPC will resume the cutting cycle in March.

KEY NUMBERS (January):

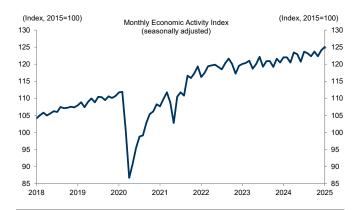

Economic Activity Index (ISE): +2.7% yoy (+0.8% mom sa) vs. Consensus at 1.9% yoy and GS at 1.0% yoy.

DETAILS:

- 1. According to the ISE monthly activity indicator, real economic activity grew by 0.8% mom sa in January, slowing from 1.5% mom sa Dec. '24. With the January print, the carryover for 1Q25 stands at a robust +1.4% qoq sa and for the whole of 2025 at 2.0%.
- Monthly activity prints have been highly volatile, owing to unstable seasonal filters. The 4Q24 readings were revised by an average of 5bp each in absolute terms. Accounting for all data revisions, the Dec. activity level was upgraded by a modest 7bp.
- 3. The sequential contraction was broad-based. Primary activities were solid, growing 1.0% mom sa (vs. 1.2% mom sa in Dec.). Secondary and tertiary activities (services, commerce, and energy supply) expanded by 0.6% mom sa apiece, and their growth rate also slowed vis-à-vis the previous month.
- 4. The composition of tertiary activities was softer, with most sectors retrenching.

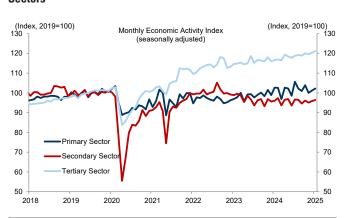

- Public administration, arts & entertainment (+0.7% mom sa) was the main growth engine, likely on the back of budgetary rollover from unexecuted 2024 spending funds—real central government spending ex-interest grew a large 23% yoy in January. Conversely, information & communication (-0.8% mom sa), energy supply (-0.2% mom sa), and financial activities (-0.1% mom sa) retrenched. Commerce & transport activities (-0.1% mom sa) also declined despite strong core retail sales.
- 5. The 2.6% year-on-year expansion benefitted mostly from strong public administration, arts & entertainment (6.2% yoy; 1.3pp contribution), and commerce & transport (5.2% yoy; 1.1pp contribution). By comparison, the primary sector (-0.1% yoy; -0.1pp contribution) and energy supply (-0.3% yoy; 0pp contribution) were drags on activity.
- 6. We expect activity momentum will moderate in the remainder of Q1, as some transitory headwinds dissipate. Thereafter, we see positive but below-trend real growth, bolstered by further disinflation gains, the progressive normalization of the policy stance, and in the near-term a large minimum wage hike. Elevated domestic policy uncertainty will continue to weigh on consumer and business confidence. Depressed housing investment and slowing of the flow of US workers remittances are the main downside risk to our growth forecast.
